local politics and assists with the growth and sustainability of our city

I believe one attribute that makes a community strong is its ability to offer incentives for people to live within it. Some of these are jobs with living wages that support people living locally, tax receipts that benefit the city and its residents and providing support for small businesses to hire and grow. We should be able to provide affordable transportation, parking and child care while maintaining a balance that fosters diverse cultural view points and supports the needs everyone. During my tenure at Bloomberg, LP I worked with listed lobbyists for large corporations working to advance their interests while Mike Bloomberg was the mayor of New York. While the company was separate from the administration we were always cognizant of the impact of big business on New York City and its residents. The work of planning for growth at early stages and the decision-making process that will affect the future of the community is something I'm interested in learning. Being part of a community where people know each other and look out for one and other is important to me and something I want to spend time working on.
